

New Era Electronics achieves ISO/TS-16949 automotive quality standard certification for manufacturing facilities in Taiwan and China

Phoenix, Arizona: January 14, 2009. New Era Electronics, Ltd. (NEE), a leader in cost effective volume production of microwave printed circuit boards, has recently achieved ISO/TS-16949 certification for its fabrication facility in Taoyuan, Taiwan, joining its sister facility in Guangzhou, China, which had already received this certification. Certification to this standard is a requirement to participate in high-volume automotive electronics production for many companies in the world.

“NEE has made the commitment as a company to succeed in the challenging quality and cost environment of the automotive marketplace”, said Jack Daniels, President of NEE International. “We have existing customers in that market utilizing our facility in China and see additional opportunities in the automotive wireless market that can now be supported from our main plant in Taiwan.”

“As the automotive market embraces wireless technology for new capabilities such as lane change assist, collision avoidance, adaptive cruise control and advanced communication capabilities, we intend to establish NEE as the leader in production of the advanced printed circuit boards needed as they become a part of many more models than in the past”, added Kevin Walker, Vice President of Sales and Marketing for NEE International. “It’s a natural fit to our existing business in the wireless infrastructure market and leverages many of the key strengths we already have as a company.”
